Synopsis

The Modernist outsider Â "The essence of the artistic design in building â " like all art â " indeed provides meaning for manâ ™s existence and in itself it confirms its result that became form." - Hans Scharoun German architect Hans Scharoun (1893-1972) studied and practiced architecture his entire adult life but did not build a major building until 1963 when his impressive Berlin Philharmonie finally came to life. The fact that he stayed in Germany during the Second World War prevented him from realizing grandiose projects and caused him to concentrate more on interiors than exteriors for many years. Nevertheless, Scharoun's sculptural designs, influenced by the expressionist-utopian circle "GlÃ¤serne Kette" of which he was a member, did not go unnoticed and were among the best of his generation.
